tream of blazing liquid flowed toward the manhole, and William Smith, a neman, of No. 128 Oak street, realizing the danger of the workmen, seized a moom and tried to steen the flow. The burning gasolene surrounded him that will act as a solvent to granite, turning the stone to water. This chemical plays a strong part in "A Rock in the Baltic," Robert Barr's wonderful story of mystery, love and adventure, which begins in the Sunday World next Sunday.
